Job interview - Emile Holemans

I will be writing my reflection on a job interview I did for an event organizing company. For this interview, I prepared by looking at their website to find out exactly what their values are and their mission. Most importantly, I informed myself about the partners and types of events they do. Having no background in the event industry, I mentioned my motivation by addressing my interests in the music industry and the event sector overall. I dressed up as I am for this job, not too casual and not too fancy, as I believe some jobs look at different aspects, especially this specific job. I mentioned some personal background and my own pros and cons. I figured I could lie about myself, although I was genuinely interested in getting this job, so I tried to find the balance between what I could say and what I shouldn't mention. I talked about having had a stroke a few months ago, and that I wanted to get a job, but I couldn't do much yet. I also mentioned that I'm mostly English speaking, although my dutch is fluent I feel more confident speaking English. I said that I like to work in a team and that I value collaboration.

What didn't seem to work was talking a lot about my background (especially the areas that were not so relevant to the job position). I figured next time I would prepare my story and adapt it to the specific position to get the job. I talked about the countries I lived in, the things I studied, although I could tell they cared more about personality and the will to work. Therefore, I don't think mentioning emotional background and struggles is always a good thing, but I tried to find the balance in being honest and showing my true work ethic.

What I would change in the future is to prepare my conversation by highlighting the main points about myself that are relevant to the specific position. I do think it's good to mention the things I'm not good at, but in a different approach, showcasing a will to learn. Eventually, I got the job because I adapted the interview to the specific position and showed my personality. Showing my personality, I realised I will always try to do so in the future.